California lawmakers passed a 2024–25 budget this week that rejected Gov. Gavin Newsom's proposal to cut in-home supportive services for low-income immigrants who are older, blind or have disabilities, and lack legal residency. But the Democratic governor has not said whether he'll use his line-item veto authority to help close the state's $45 billion deficit.

The Legislature, controlled by Democrats, passed a $211 billion general fund spending plan for the fiscal year starting July 1 by drawing more from the state's rainy-day fund and reducing corporate tax deductions to prevent cuts to health and social services.

"Our legislative budget plan achieves those goals with targeted, carefully calibrated investments in safety-net programs that protect our most vulnerable," said Assemblymember Jesse Gabriel, chair of the Assembly's budget committee, following voting in Sacramento.

Newsom and lawmakers are expected to continue talks.

"What was approved today represents a two-house agreement between the Senate and the Assembly — not an agreement with the governor," said state Department of Finance spokes person H.D. Palmer. "We've made good progress, but there's still more work to do."

Newsom had proposed eliminating the new in-home benefit for qualified immigrants to save nearly $95 million in the next fiscal year, with no plans to bring it back. Lawmakers not only rejected Newsom's cut to the in-home services program, but also refused the governor's proposal to slash $300 million a year from public health agencies.

Buy they accepted delaying food assistance to low-income older immigrants without legal residency.

The In-Home Supportive Services program helps low-income older, blind and disabled individuals receive care in their homes, which helps keep them out of more costly nursing and residential facilities. The program works by paying $16 to $21 an hour to caregivers, many of them family members.

Advocates applauded lawmakers for rejecting the cut. They had urged the governor to adopt the Legislature's budget, arguing the state could end up paying more in the long run as Medi-Cal recipients tap nursing services. The state has estimated the annual per-person cost of nursing homes is $124,189, compared with the roughly $28,000 average cost for people without legal residency in the in-home services program.

"These individuals would need to essentially go into costly hospital or nursing care," said Ronald Coleman Baeza, managing policy director at the California Pan-Ethnic Health Network. "It's not only cruel for undocumented immigrants, but it doesn't make sense as a fiscal decision either."

Newsom, though, has said he's trying to maintain fiscal discipline while preserving Medi-Cal benefits for immigrants. California was the first state to expand Medicaid eligibility to all qualified immigrants regardless of legal status, phasing it in over several years: children in 2016, adults ages 19-26 in 2020, people 50 and older in 2022, and all remaining adults this year.

"It's a core of I think who we are as a state,," Newsom said in May, "and (who) we should be as a nation."

As part of the Medi-Cal expansion, the state authorized nearly 3,000 older, blind and disabled immigrants without legal residency to access paramedical services and daily care, including meal preparation, bathing, feeding and transportation to medical appointments. Advocates estimate 17,000 immigrants qualify.

“Fixing California’s deficit means making tough choices,” Assembly Speaker Robert Rivas, a Central Coast Democrat, said in an earlier statement, “so the Assembly came to these negotiations focused on preserving programs that matter most to Californians.”

Lawmakers, though, did agree to Newsom’s proposal to delay around $165 a month in food assistance to low-income immigrants without legal residency ages 55 and older. Lawmakers had approved the benefit two years ago, but the governor proposed delaying it by two fiscal years to 2027.
