Wildfires raging in Southern California have left at least 11 dead, 130,000 evacuated and unprecedented destruction in the region. Authorities have declared a nighttime curfew to prevent looting and ensure public safety as firefighters struggle to contain the blaze.

A devastating panorama The Pacific Palisades fire, active since Tuesday, has consumed more than 35,000 hectares, equivalent to twice the size of Manhattan, and has destroyed thousands of structures, including 12 schools. Meanwhile, the Eaton Fire, which has forced the evacuation of entire communities, continues to be monitored by authorities.

"The Palisades Fire is one of the most destructive natural disasters in the history of Los Angeles," stated local authorities. Meanwhile, it was confirmed that the Kenneth Fire, which started on Thursday, was intentionally set, and a suspect is already in custody.

Curfew and looting arrests For the night of Friday to Saturday, authorities have implemented a curfew from 18:00 to 6:00 in the most affected areas. So far, 20 people have been arrested for thefts from evacuated homes. In addition, soldiers from the California National Guard have been deployed to reinforce security.

Solidarity and international aid In the midst of the crisis, Prince Harry and Meghan Markle visited a shelter in Pasadena that houses more than 1,200 evacuees. The couple, together with chefs José Andrés and Roy Choi, collaborated in the distribution of food.

Mexico will also send firefighters and specialized personnel to help contain the fires. This cooperation seeks to alleviate the overload of the local authorities, who are facing adverse conditions due to the strong Santa Ana winds.

Protecting those affected California Insurance Commissioner Ricardo Lara announced a one-year moratorium prohibiting the cancellation of insurance policies in areas impacted by the fires. "Our priority is to ensure that victims receive the support they need," Lara said at a press conference.

Warnings and evacuations underway The Los Angeles Fire Department issued new warnings for the Encino, Tarzana and Woodland Hills areas. Jesse Gabriel, a member of the State Assembly, urged residents to remain vigilant and prepared to evacuate immediately.

The situation in Los Angeles remains critical, and authorities are expected to constantly update information to protect residents and slow the advance of the fire.
