SACRAMENTO, Calif. (AP) — Democrat Sydney Kamlager had a commanding lead Wednesday in a special election for a Los Angeles-area Assembly seat, collecting well above the majority of votes needed to avoid a June runoff, according to preliminary results.

The Los Angeles County clerk hasn't said how many ballots remain to be counted in the elections Tuesday for three open Assembly seats.

Runoffs are almost certain in the two other districts, with Democrats leading in both races and Republicans in second place.

Less than 10 percent of the 800,000 registered voters in the three districts cast ballots, according to preliminary results. Fewer than 65,000 votes had been counted as of Wednesday morning.

The elections were held to replace three Democratic lawmakers who resigned last year.

The eventual winners will serve out the remainder of the current terms, which end in December. They will need to win again in the November general election to serve the next two-year term.

Kamlager, a community college district trustee, had 68 percent of the vote in the 54th District, previously represented by Sebastian Ridley-Thomas, who resigned last year citing health problems.

In the other districts, Assemblymen Matt Dababneh and Raul Bocanegra stepped down after facing sexual harassment accusations.

Democrat Luz Rivas was in the lead with 41 percent of the vote to replace Bocanegra, followed by Republican Ricardo Antonio Benitez. Four Democrats split the remainder of the vote.

Bocanegra resigned his seat in the 39th District after women accused him of unwanted groping and kissing. He has denied committing any crimes against the women.

His northeast San Fernando Valley district has lacked representation since November.

In the election to replace Dababneh, Democrat Jesse Gabriel led with 32 percent, followed by Republican Justin Clark with 27 percent.

The southwest San Fernando Valley district has lacked representation in the Assembly since Jan. 1, when Dababneh resigned.

A lobbyist said Dababneh pushed her into a bathroom during a social event in Las Vegas and masturbated in front of her, which he denies.

Gabriel, an attorney, and Clark, a college student, will likely advance to a runoff in the 45th District. Democrat Tricia Robbins Kasson, a Los Angeles City Council aide, was third in preliminary results.

Democrats outnumber Republicans more than 2-to-1 in each district.

Los Angeles County said turnout gauged from preliminary returns ranged from roughly 6 percent in the 39th District to roughly 9 percent in the 45th District.

Except for a sliver of the 45th District in Ventura County, where just 231 people voted, all three districts are in Los Angeles County.

The elections are estimated to cost $1.6 million, according to Los Angeles County.
