Gov. Gavin Newsom on Monday signed legislation that will help California make significant progress on the state's housing construction and equity goals.

The package of 15 bills signed Monday includes new rights for tenants and community groups to purchase homes facing foreclosure, as well as a series of improvements to state law that will lead to more inclusive and affordable neighborhoods so housing can be within reach of more working Californians.

The COVID-19 pandemic has put additional stress on low- and moderate-income California households, as they struggle to afford rent and mortgages amidst job loss and economic stress caused by the pandemic.

The bills the governor signed will streamline funding for affordable housing, encourage developers to build more moderate-income homes, and help teachers find housing affordable for them.

The bill package follows on the governor's signature on Aug. 31 of AB 3088, the strongest statewide protections in America to prevent millions of evictions and foreclosures for tenants and property owners who have suffered economic impacts from COVID-19.

"While the pandemic has dominated the news, millions of California families continue to struggle to afford housing – this is a crisis that never went away and this housing package will directly lead to more affordable opportunities for renters and homeowners," said Gov. Newsom. "I applaud the Legislature's leaders on housing who continued to push for these important bills, and we all acknowledge more work remains to be done next year. I am committed to continuing to push the envelope on housing affordability and neighborhood inclusivity."
