California legislators are considering a bill that could potentially ban the sale of skittles and several other popular snacks because research shows some of the chemicals in them are toxic.

The bill would force companies to change the recipes of some beloved sweets, including M&Ms and Nerds candy, or to take drastic measures and pull their items from the California market. It's unclear if the bill will gain momentum, but if passed, California would become the first state to ban specific additives in food.

The ban would apply to five chemicals-red dye No. 3, titanium dioxide, potassium bromate, brominated vegetable oil and propylparaben- which are generally used as preservatives, dyes and texture enhancers. The chemicals are approved for consumption in the U.S. by the Food and Drug Administration (FDA), but are all banned in Europe due to safety concerns.

Some of the bill's supporters believe that federal regulations have overlooked scientific research linking the chemicals to ailments including cancer, neurological problems and behavioral issues in children.

The assembly member behind the bill, Jesse Gabriel, confesses that he loves candy, especially Skittles, and that he definitely wouldn't support a bill to ban Skittles. That's not the bill's intention, he tells TIME. "This bill is about getting companies to change their recipes," Gabriel says. "They still sell Skittles in Europe. They just removed titanium dioxide, which is a very dangerous ingredient."

As a father of three young children, Gabriel worries about additives like these chemicals, citing risks for children's development, reproductive issues and concerns over carcinogens and damage to the immune system.

"Part of the reason we chose [these five] is because for each of them, there is a readily available safer alternative," Gabriel says.
