We can add Skittles to the list of things that are officially under threat. While it's perhaps not as serious as, say, the threat to the climate, there's a bill going through the California legislature that would prohibit Skittles and a number of other foods. But never fear: If you're going to miss the fruit(-ish)-flavored candies if the bill should pass — or just want to be on the safe side — we've found an organic version for you.

The proposed ban is due to the fact that Skittles contains additives that officials say can cause cancer, such as titanium dioxide. A lot of these are already banned in the EU, but the U.S. has a history of lagging behind when it comes to banning the chemicals, compounds, and additives their European brethren have already prohibited for safety reasons (for example, the U.S. currently only bans 11 cosmetic ingredients; the EU well over 1,300).

However, Amazon has a solution: YUMEARTH's Organic Giggles. You can pick up a five-ounce package of the "chewy candy bites" for $10.83 right now. Maybe $11 is a little steep for a sweet treat, but at least you don't have to worry about the risk of getting cancer from it.

If you want to tune into the legislation as it happens, keep an eye on Bill AB418, introduced by Assemblyman Jesse Gabriel last month. It's meant to ban titanium dioxide, red dye 3, potassium bromate, propylparaben, and brominated vegetable oil from foods sold in California (three of these — titanium dioxide, potassium bromate, and brominated vegetable oil — are already illegal in the EU). Other food under the magnifying glass is Campbell's soup, Sour Patch Kids, PEZ, and Sun Drop soda, according to the Daily Mail.

And while you're at it — you might want to check your mineral SPF: Titanium dioxide, which is scientifically known to be toxic, according to Insider, is also a frequent entry on the list of ingredients.
